

Sleepless nights.
Urine everywhere.
And not even the baby to go with it.

For the millions of women in the developing world who suffer from Obstetric Fistula, there isn't much joy in motherhood.

Their trials begin with an obstructed delivery. Without the option of a caesarean section, they have little choice but to push. So push they do. For up to seven days.

In the end, their babies die and their inner tissues rot away, leaving a hole between their bladder or rectum and their vagina.

From that day on these women will leak urine, even faeces, from between their legs and will be unable to stop it no matter what they try.

Soon the smell will become so powerful that, likely as not, they will be ostracised by their communities and left to grieve alone.

Terrible as this is to contemplate, it's even worse to live with. Which is why The Campaign to End Fistula needs your help.

We help to provide the operations that repair Obstetric Fistula, as well as the emergency caesarean sections that can prevent it from even happening in the first place.
